In Paris With you

Clémentine Beauvais

Translated from the French
by Sam Taylor

*Don't talk to me of love. Let's talk of Paris,
The little bit of Paris in our view.
There's that crack across the ceiling
And the hotel walls are peeling
And I'm in Paris with you.*

James Fenton, 'In Paris With You'

Because their story didn't end at the right time, in the right place,

because they let their feelings go to waste, it was written, I think, that Eugene and Tatiana would find each other
ten years later,
one morning in winter,
under terra firma,
on the Meteor, Line 14 (magenta) of the Paris

Metro.

It was quarter to nine.

Imagine Eugene, dressed up fine: black corduroys, pale blue check Oxford shirt, sensible collar, charcoal tweed jacket, a grey scarf, probably cashmere, frayed at the ends,

wrapped once,
twice
around his neck – and above this hung a face that had softened
since the last time;
a face written more loosely,
a face less harsh, and more patient.
Suppler, gentler.
A face rinsed clean of its adolescence;
the face of a young man who had learned to stifle his impatience, a young man who had learned how to wait.

Tatiana, funnily enough, had been thinking about him the previous evening.
Which might seem an amazing coincidence, except that she often thought about him – and I'm sure that you, too, can brood and mope, sometimes, about love affairs that went wrong years ago.
The pain's not worse after ten years.
It doesn't necessarily increase with time.
 It's not

an investment,
you know,
regret.

Lost love doesn't have to be a tragedy.
There's not always enough material there for a story.
 But for these two,
 I'll make an exception, if you don't mind.
 Look how shaken they are to find each other again.
 Look at their eyes . . .

'Eugene, hi, haven't seen you for ages!'
beamed Tatiana, a pretty good actress.
 He sat down next to her; the seat was still warm.
 On the black window reflecting his face, a sleeper's forehead had stamped a little circle of grease like the watermark on a banknote.
A record of time spent, now disappearing.
 Tatiana could see herself in the window too,
 at an angle, as the train sped up, roaring.
The sudden surges, sharp bends and screeching stops of Line 14 are notoriously vicious. It's hard to stand up or chat or read. But it does have an upside: it takes you from your first stop

to your last

fast.

As they rushed from one place to another, Tatiana stared at the window that reflected him and her together.

Eugene yelled:

'So how are things? I had no idea you were pregnant ...'

She wasn't.

And yet, it was difficult to contradict Eugene at that moment, since on her duffle coat was a massive badge, and on that badge a baby grinned, a big white speech bubble proudly declaring in capital letters:

BABY ON BOARD!

And in smaller letters, just below:

THANK YOU FOR GIVING ME YOUR SEAT.

So it was only logical that Eugene (who was feeling somewhat upset by this news, and surprised to be upset, and a bit confused) should come to this conclusion.

There was an explanation,
which could not be given then and there:
that because empty seats were so rare on the Paris metro between eight and nine a.m.,

Tatiana had, a few months before,
bought this VIP (very impregnated person) pass, her guarantee of a place to rest her bum.
She loved seeing all those kind ladies and gentlemen
spot her badge and leap to their feet as if their seat
were on fire.
She would thank them, flashing soft Virgin Mary smiles.

And since there was nothing secret about her condition, it often set off shouted conversations about baby names,

and baby clothes,
and giving birth, and epidurals,
and nurseries,
and breastfeeding,
and so on, and so on.
She'd had to do some research into the mysteries of maternity.

She needed a coherent story, for at that time of day, it was often the same passengers standing/swaying/sitting in the train carriage.

She couldn't claim one day that she was four months gone with twins, and the next that it was a little girl with Down's that she and her husband had decided to keep,
and the day after that that it was a miracle child, conceived after eight rounds of IVE, and the day after that that she was a surrogate mother for two gay men.

No one would believe her if her story kept changing.

This need for precision was the price she had to pay for a free seat every day . . . until spring, when she could ride a Vélib' to the National Library without shivering.

'Who's the father?' asked Eugene.
'The father? His name's Murray.'
'Murray? Do I know him?'
'No, I don't think so – he's British,'
said Tatiana, who had just invented him.

For a moment they were silent.

Then Tatiana paid him a compliment:

'You look very elegant!'

'Ah, thank you,' Eugene replied.

'I'm going to my grandfather's funeral.'

'Oh! That's great!' said Tatiana, who obviously hadn't given herself enough time to process this information.

Next station:

Gare de Lyon.

To the right, on the other side of the tracks, a lush tropical forest suddenly appeared behind glass.

(I remember how,
aged seven or eight,
I used to daydream
about seeing snakes
and monkeys in there.)

The doors slid open and a voice, automated, intimated

in three languages, no less, that passengers should exit from the left side of the train.

Bajada por el lado izquierdo.

(When I was young and everything was new and a source of wonder, I used to ponder
what kind of aliens this obscure message was addressing.
'It's in case there are any Spaniards on the train,'
my father explained.
'So they know where to get off.'
I wasn't sure what Spaniards were.
I imagined them tall and rubbery,
I don't know why.
For months,
whenever we came into the Gare de Lyon, I would watch, heart pounding, hands clasping my skirt, eager for a glimpse of those elastic creatures, who,
disobeying the train man's very clear directive, would open the door jungle side and vanish, undetected, into the forest of palms.)

But let's get back to our two passengers.
Their memories are more important than mine.
They have things to tell each other that they can't articulate.

So they say other stuff, though of course it barely conceals what's really on their minds.
One of those cowardly conversations, on this and that and the weather, avoiding the heart of the matter.
That's what happens when everything has gone to waste:
we can't say it out loud;
we chicken out.
Thankfully someone inside us speaks in our place.

'So what about you? Where are you going?'
Eugene asked politely.
*'To the National Library. Like I do every morning,
at precisely
the same time . . . you know, if by any chance you're planning to make the same trip tomorrow . . .'*

He's going to the cemetery, you idiot!
Tatiana yelled at herself inside her head.

Thankfully,
it was fine:
Eugene didn't notice her blunder, busy as he was trying to remember what he was supposed to be doing tomorrow at quarter to nine.

'What are you up to in the library?'

'I'm working on my thesis.

I'm in the last year of my PhD.'

'Oh yeah? What's your thesis about?'

'History of art. It's on Caillebotte.

Gustave Caillebotte.'

Then she shifted into autopilot:

Don't worry, no one knows anything about Caillebotte . . .

'Don't worry, no one knows anything about Caillebotte. He was a nineteenth-century artist – a painter and collector, theoretically part of the Impressionist movement, but in fact his paintings are much more precise, more classical in a way – you might have seen one of his more famous pictures: a view of Paris in the rain, Haussmann-style buildings like a ship's bow, with a man and a woman under an umbrella . . .'

'I know,

I know,'

Eugene interrupted.

'I know exactly who Caillebotte is,' he muttered.

'Ah! Perfect.

Well then, you know everything.'

To her chagrin, Tatiana felt that this declaration somehow carried the implication that her thesis didn't really amount to much.

Not wishing to leave Eugene with this impression, she started to describe to him, with a level of detail that might seem excessive, part of her third chapter, still largely hypothetical at this stage, about the representation of water in Caillebotte's art; in this chapter, Tatiana demonstrated, in a boldly rhetorical way, that the liquid elements in Caillebotte's paintings – rivers, bathwater, rain – were a sort of discreet reply to the stodgy, spongy daubings of certain other artists around at the same time.

When she finished this explanation, the train howled to a stop at the National Library metro station.
Eugene got off too.

‘Is your funeral near here?’ asked Tatiana, not very tactfully.

I’m going to walk. I have plenty of time.’

They stood in silence on the escalator,

Tatiana leaning clumsily to the right, turned backwards
so she could face Eugene, her right foot in front of her left to hide the ladder
in her tights.

Eugene seemed pensive.

Tatiana noticed

some fine lines on his brow

that had not been there last time, though she might have anticipated their arrival because of all the frowning he used to do ten years ago to express his disapproval.

As a teen he’d disapproved of everything – the boy was always bored – while she’d been too easily pleased and lost in a daydream.

She wondered vaguely if she was still in love with him.

‘It’d be nice to see each other again,’ Eugene told her halfway up the escalator.

As this sentence prompted a thousand questions, Tatiana asked none of them and concentrated instead on the immediate perils of her ascension:
her left arm,

pulled by the handrail,

was escaping upwards,

faster

than the steps.

She checked that her scarf was not dragging on the floor, to make sure it wouldn’t choke her at the end of the ride.
(She’d seen a video of a similar incident on the Internet.

The guy died.)

'Can I have your number?' Eugene asked.
'Of course,' she said, reciting it digit by digit.
He texted her so she would have his too.

She already had it.

Apparently he hadn't changed his number in the past ten years.

Apparently he hadn't kept hers.

'How's Olga?' Eugene asked casually, as they were elbowing their way towards the turnstiles.

'Oh . . . fine, you know. She's got two daughters now.'

'Ah, cool! They'll be cousins to yours, I mean.'

Tatiana had momentarily forgotten the whole story with the badge.

This was her chance to come clean:

'Listen, I'm not really pregnant. I just bought this thing

so I'd get a seat on the metro every morning.'

Eugene threw his head back and laughed.

But the laughter surprised him because it was more than laughter.

It gave Eugene the feeling that he was like a snowdrop or something, one of those flowers that break through the white winter crust and suddenly breathe the icy air.

The laughter of someone who, until that laugh, must not have been truly aware that he was alive.

'I did think you were a bit young for that kind of responsibility.'

'People always feel too young for responsibility,' said Tatiana. 'Any kind.

A kitten, a bonsai tree . . .

Keeping your ticket
till the end of your journey.'

She sighed as if to herself. 'I have to use tickets now.
I didn't renew my Navigo card – I've got no murray at the moment.'

'No murray?'

'No money.

Damn it,

I don't know why

I can't speak properly today.'

'But no Murray either?' Eugene ventured.

'No Murray either, no. Murray was an underground invention.' Eugene smiled and nodded, alarmed at the realisation that the mere idea

of brushing against Tatiana – the crowd was pressed tight together as everyone pushed towards the exit – made his head swim,
knees buckle
and pulse race
as though he were standing on the top of a high-dive board staring into the depths below.
'You go first, it'll be easier that way.'
The turnstile must have had a sense of humour (or maybe it was just that their wool coats rubbed against each other)
because it gave them an electric shock.

Tatiana stuck her ticket in an ikebana of trash,
a foul efflorescence of ash,
in one of those bins where smokers stub their cigarettes.

Outside, it was the usual tornado between the four towers of the National Library.

In all kinds of weather,
even in the middle of a hot August afternoon, while the whole city languishes, breathlessly,
under a coal-black sun,
those library stairways are eternally swept by typhoons.
Apparently it's an aerodynamic phenomenon related to the positioning of the towers.
A small architectural mistake.

And everyone complains about it, everyone bellyaches, but no one thinks of the joy of those four buildings playing ping-
pong with the wind,
lifting up skirts,
artistically swirling the leaves and dirt.
It's too bad
how the happiness of some makes others sad.

Eugene and Tatiana walked through this whirlwind, and between them brief electrifying glances darted and fled,
the way little crabs dart and flee

when children touch their fingers to a rock pool by the sea.
Their little dance of glances might have gone on like this forever, but someone got in the way.
He was a tall man,
handsome,
perhaps,
if your idea of beauty is the cold hard ice of marble, if your idea of beauty is the tough leather, scarred, of tree bark.
He was a powerful man,
sensual,
perhaps,
if sensuality for you
is a craggy mountaintop
in the wind-lashed dawn.
I believe it was Edmund Burke who used the word sublime to describe that beauty, cracked and mineral, that wild beauty, rough and material, which not only attracts but terrifies.
'How glad I am to see you, Tatiana!
I'd wondered if our paths might cross today,' declared this man, who was, it turned out, the supervisor of her thesis on Caillebotte.

She hastened to introduce him to Eugene, who caught only brief snatches of their words,
Mr Leprince
well-known specialist
French Impressionism
preoccupied as he was by other things:
made notable discoveries about Renoir Tatiana's pink, chapped lips, her dimpled chin, a few white cat hairs on her raspberry scarf, her posture, curved to the left was the curator
of the exhibition at the Musée du Luxembourg
by the weight of her bag, presumably stuffed with books and notes.
'That's very interesting,' said Eugene, who really couldn't have cared less about Caillebotte or Renoir
or Monet
and analysed
Degas's correspondence

or Degas.

Bloody Degas,
with his stupid ballerinas.

But just to participate in the conversation, he said: 'Hey, that reminds me – it's been ages since I went to the Musée d'Orsay.'

It was then that Eugene noticed Tatiana's dark shining hair,
blown by the wind
into delicate arcs.

*And what, my dear,
are your plans for the day?*

He also noticed that she had very pretty teeth, small, pearly, with nice little spaces – he hadn't realised that back then.

Hang on,
didn't she used to wear braces before?

Before: ten years ago, she was ... Hang on ...
Fourteen!
Well yeah, there you go: fourteen.
At that age, you're still under construction.

I'm going to reread Valéry as you suggested recently

And now, it had all changed: her hair, her skin, her teeth.
I remember how young she seemed,
like a little kid.

*I didn't take enough notes before.
And it's always useful to return to sources that you think you know.*

And I was practically an adult, thought Eugene.

And suddenly
he remembered: fuck, I was seventeen. Seventeen!

Seventeen years old! Christ, that's beyond belief.
Did it really exist, that age? Seventeen!

It's impossible, seventeen. It's pure fiction.

It's an age dreamed up to make old people believe that they used to be adolescents.

Whereas in reality, it's absolutely certain that no one in the whole wide world was ever seventeen.

Eugene, however, was beginning to realise

If you ever need to see me, just drop by

that this thesis supervisor, sublime
in the Burkean sense of the term, was, quite calmly and casually,

your brilliant work is always a pleasure to read but very clearly, trying to pull Tatiana.
It was obvious that he, too, had seen the interlacing of her hair in the wind, her white teeth, those nice spaces in between,
and I am of course eager to hear you speak
at the museum
next week
and he suddenly wondered if there wasn't something going on between those two that he should have been told about,
before remembering that, only this morning,
as recently as quarter to nine, he hadn't thought about Tatiana more than five or six times
in ten years.
He'd tried his best not to; whenever he'd got close,
anywhere near,
to thinking of her, by chance – of her, of that summer –
he'd tiptoed back,
clicked shut the door,

again and again,
on that room in his mind where he'd stored that July, that August, those joys. That pain.
So she'd been wiped from his memory for years, and now here he was, full of fears,
like some jealous husband,
a member of the Taliban, some big macho idiot: the kind of guy who appears on TV at one
in the morning to explain why he can't stand the fact that his wife is a fan of Simon Le Bon.

And yet it was interesting for Eugene, who had hardly ever experienced this kind of feeling before, to sense the overwhelming power of his desire, when he looked at this man (sublime
in the Burkean sense of the term),
to murder him
in a very aggressive way.
by the by, I heard that a wonderful article you wrote is going to be published in Art History?
Eugene was overcome by the urge to provoke him to a duel,

like they used to in the olden days.
If Lensky was here, he'd have been his second.
Shit, he hadn't thought about Lensky in years!
I've really got to go, I've booked a desk in the library for half past nine.
It was Tatiana who'd said those words.
Until soon, maybe, Eugene . . .
Tatiana was leaving. She'd booked a desk for half past nine.
The library awaits!
The library awaited.
*It was nice to see you again.
Really nice.*
It was nice. Really nice.
A kiss on the left cheek, a kiss on the right cheek.
The smell of cold,
cigarettes, bergamot.
Time to get back to my Caillebotte.
What a stupid name, Caillebotte. Really, it was the stupidest name ever.
He watched
with wonder Tatiana
descend

the stairs
in the gusts
of the architectural blunder.

As Eugene was about to leave, feeling a bit flat, tired and sad,
the sublime (in the Burkean sense of the term) man suddenly said
in his guttural voice – the kind of voice you hear on posh radio stations
like France Culture;
a voice drowning in static; rough, gravelly, the kind you want to sweep like a driveway – he said in this voice to Eugene:
'And how is it, sir, that you know Tatiana?
I don't believe she has mentioned your name.'
'I was friends with the boyfriend of her Olga sister,' replied Eugene, forcing himself to use the same rhythm, but getting his words mixed up.
'I mean, her older sister. Olga,' he corrected.
'Ah! A genuine, longstanding connection!
Then I'm not telling you anything new if I say
That she is the brightest student in my collection;
From the indistinct mass of my PhDs,

dear Tatiana

no, not even a dear I don't think I even said dear
I was a little turd back then

I was hardly even me back then has she thought about me recently did she recognise me straight away why has she changed like that has she really changed as much as all that was she that pretty before was she that witty before was it the brace on her teeth that hid her soul from me is thirty-five minutes enough time to fall in love with a girl or fall back in love

was I in love with her back then did I have a personality back then was I really a human being back then was there anything inside my head

is he sleeping with her
is he sleeping with her?

I don't remember what I told her that day if only I could remember what the hell did I say?

then I could explain

perhaps she's waiting for me to apologise but I could hardly apologise to her just then down in the metro, on the fourteenth line, five minutes after seeing her again am I getting myself worked up over nothing very much did she already possess such beauty such intelligence such personality is she sleeping with him would anyone notice if I missed my grandfather's funeral?

yeah
probably

I think Mum would probably notice particularly as I'm supposed to give a speech damn if I run

could I catch her
is she already in the library is she waiting for me to call her
is he sleeping with her
is he sleeping with her?

These are just some of the thousands of questions that we will leave Eugene (for now) to wrestle with, alone.

Because it's time
for a brief summary of the facts.
It's time to go back
about ten years

into the past,

back to when it all began.

2

It all began

in a leafy suburb of Paris, neither poor nor very rich,
in a white house
that looks like a Playmobil house.

There, Tatiana lives peacefully with her older sister Olga and their mother.

The fourth actor in this domestic tragedy

(not counting me)

is the neighbours' son.

His real name is Léonard, though everyone calls him Lensky.

He's a poet,

but not the boring sort.

He does slam – like rap, but slower.
